Question of the Day: How do we know that the vaccines are safe, given how quickly they were developed? (Johns Hopkins Bloomberg School of Public Health)

- In the United States, the FDA has required the same large clinical trial that it would otherwise require for a vaccine. We didn't do what some other countries did and approve it just based on some blood test results; we actually looked at tens of thousands of people to see whether or not it prevented the disease.
- One of the ways the process was sped up is that the taxpayers put a lot of money into this program—that was run out of the White House—to allow companies to basically start each part of the process right from the beginning.
- Typically, what would happen is a company might do one study and see whether it works. If it doesn't work, then they're done. If it does work, then they start planning the next phase. And if that phase works, then they start planning the next. Everything is A, then B, then C. But with the money that the taxpayers put forward, the companies were able to do A, B, and C all at once. So, they started that first phase and if that worked, they were ready to get going on that second phase. If it wasn't going to work, they would have lost all the money [spent] preparing for the second phase.
- But what they gained was time. They were able to move from A, to B, to C so much quicker because they didn't have that period in between where they were assessing and figuring out what kind of investment [would be needed] for the next round.
